T. B. Will No Longer Be Principal Disease Killer In U S A

Tuberculosis, which in 1900 killed more persons in the United States than any other disease, now occupies seventh place among the leading causes of death. As late as 1948, 70 out of every 100,000 persons in this country died each year from tuberculosis. But by 1948 the tuberculosis death rate had declined almost 60 per cent, with only 30 out of every 100,000 persons succumbing to the disease.

The key to reducing mortality from tuberculosis is detecting the disease in its early stages by X-ray. School children are periodically given chest X-rays, as are workers in many industrial plants. All men and women who join the U.S. armed forces are also given chest X-rays both upon entering and leaving the services. Many hospitals throughout the United States now automatically give chest X-rays to every patient that is admitted. And public health organizations and also examine all persons who receive welfare assistance for tuberculosis.

Through these group check-ups many cases of advanced tuberculosis are detected, as well as those in the early stages. Of course, when an infection is discovered early it is possible for doctors to prevent it from spreading. When community health workers discover a case of tuberculosis, they quickly check all members of the person's family, since the infection is often spread among those who live in close contact with one another. Visiting nurses also educate the families they call on in ways to guard against tuberculosis, such as observing personal hygiene and using sanitary methods in handling food and household linens.

T B In U.S.A.

Today, the U.S. Public Health Service recommends hospitalization for all persons suffering from tuberculosis. Patients in hospitals receive the best medical treatment available and do not endanger the health of other members of their families. The Federal Government has made financial grants to various States so that they can expand their hospital facilities to care for all tubercular patients in the State.

Many victims of tuberculosis are making complete recovery from the effects of the disease under new treatments that have been adopted. Streptomycin, one of the new antibiotic drugs, is proving very successful in arresting the spread of the infection. Doctors are also saving many patients by new surgical techniques. Often the disease can be checked by removing infected parts of the lung, an operation that once was rarely performed.

U S public health officials believe that control of tuberculosis is as much a social problem as a medical problem.

They point out that resistance to the disease is lowered in persons subjected to poor living conditions, such as inadequate food and improper housing. They feel that by generally improving the standard of living of persons in overcrowded metropolitan area the incidence of tuberculosis can be further reduced.
